

It has long been commonly held that state socialism and private life at home were at odds in East Germany. For GDR citizens and the regime, however, housing and the home had an important political valence that was ambiguous from the very outset, as this Special Issue on experiences of the Wende<sup>1</sup> and the following transformations will show building on the work of earlier historians. Housing created an opportunity for people to retreat from the state, to a place where citizens could literally ‘allow themselves room’ for private activities. The term Nischengesellschaft (niche society), coined in 1983, implied that in the GDR, the home was a space where citizens could escape from the regime to carve out their own slice of happiness.<sup>2</sup> After the fall of the Berlin Wall, this idea was often used to explain the political functionality of the East German state. Paul Betts, for example, suggests

<sup>1</sup> Die Wende (‘the turning point’) refers to the historical period around German reunification, 1989–90.

<sup>2</sup> Günter Gaus, the Permanent Representative of the FRG in the GDR, spoke of ‘individuelles Glück im Winkel’ – of people finding individual happiness in quiet corners. Id., Wo Deutschland liegt: Eine Ortsbestimmung (Hamburg, 1983). For Nischengesellschaft and early oral history approaches in the GDR, see Dorothee Wierling, Geboren im Jahr Eins: Der Jahrgang 1949 in der DDR – Versuch einer Kollektiviographie (Berlin, 2002). Wierling’s examination of everyday life in the GDR managed to bring to light East German citizens’ ‘tacit accommodations’ with the political system. Another oral history project that is also particularly relevant in this context is Lutz Niethammer, Alexander von Plato, and Dorothee Wierling (eds.), Die volkseigene Erfahrung: Eine Archäologie des Lebens in der Industrieprovinz der DDR. 30 biographische Eröffnungen (Berlin, 1991). For this 1987 project, a group of West German researchers was granted access – for the very first time – to undertake field work in the GDR, during which they conducted interviews with citizens.

It has long been commonly held that state socialism and private life at home were at odds in East Germany. For GDR citizens and the regime, however, housing and the home had an important political valence that was ambiguous from the very outset, as this Special Issue on experiences of the Wende<sup>1</sup> and the following transformations will show, building on the work of earlier historians. Housing created an opportunity for people to retreat from the state to a place where citizens could literally ‘allow themselves room’ for private activities. The term Nischengesellschaft (niche society), coined in 1983, implied that in the GDR, the home was a space where citizens could escape from the regime to carve out their own slice of happiness.<sup>2</sup> After the fall of the Berlin Wall, this idea was often used to explain the political functionality of the East German state. Paul Betts, for example, suggests

<sup>1</sup> Die Wende (‘the turning point’) refers to the historical period around German reunification, 1989–90.

<sup>2</sup> Günter Gaus, the Permanent Representative of the FRG in the GDR, spoke of ‘individuelles Glück im Winkel’ – of people finding individual happiness in quiet corners. Id., Wo Deutschland liegt: Eine Ortsbestimmung (Hamburg, 1983). For Nischengesellschaft and early oral history approaches in the GDR, see Dorothee Wierling, Geboren im Jahr Eins: Der Jahrgang 1949 in der DDR – Versuch einer Kollektivbiographie (Berlin, 2002). Wierling’s examination of everyday life in the GDR managed to bring to light East German citizens’ ‘tacit accommodations’ with the political system. Another oral history project that is also particularly relevant in this context is Lutz Niethammer, Alexander von Plato, and Dorothee Wierling (eds.), Die volkseigene Erfahrung: Eine Archäologie des Lebens in der Industrieprovinz der DDR. 30 biographische Eröffnungen (Berlin, 1991). For this 1987 project, a group of West German researchers was granted access – for the very first time – to undertake field work in the GDR, during which they conducted interviews with citizens.

It has long been commonly held that state socialism and private life at home were at odds in East Germany. For GDR citizens and the regime, however, housing and the home had an important political valence that was ambiguous from the very outset, as this Special Issue on experiences of the Wende<sup>1</sup> and the following transformations will show, building on the work of earlier historians. Housing created an opportunity for people to retreat from the state to a place where citizens could literally ‘allow themselves room’ for private activities. The term Nischengesellschaft (niche society), coined in 1983, implied that in the GDR, the home was a space where citizens could escape from the regime to carve out their own slice of happiness.<sup>2</sup> After the fall of the Berlin Wall, this idea was often used to explain the political functionality of the East German state. Paul Betts, for example, suggests that a new

<sup>1</sup> Die Wende (‘the turning point’) refers to the historical period around German reunification, 1989–90.

<sup>2</sup> Günter Gaus, the Permanent Representative of the FRG in the GDR, spoke of ‘individuelles Glück im Winkel’—of people finding individual happiness in quiet corners. Id., Wo Deutschland liegt: Eine Ortsbestimmung (Hamburg, 1983). For Nischengesellschaft and early oral history approaches in the GDR, see Dorothee Wierling, Geboren im Jahr Eins: Der Jahrgang 1949 in der DDR—Versuch einer Kollektivbiographie (Berlin, 2002). Wierling’s examination of everyday life in the GDR managed to bring to light East German citizens’ ‘tacit accommodations’ with the political system. Another oral history project that is also particularly relevant in this context is Lutz Niethammer, Alexander von Plato, and Dorothee Wierling (eds.), Die volkseigene Erfahrung: Eine Archäologie des Lebens in der Industrieprovinz der DDR. 30 biographische Eröffnungen (Berlin, 1991). For this 1987 project, a group of West German researchers was granted access—for the very first time—to undertake field work in the GDR, during which they conducted interviews with citizens.

It has long been commonly held that state socialism and private life at home were at odds in East Germany. For GDR citizens and the regime, however, housing and the home had an important political valence that was ambiguous from the very outset, as this Special Issue on experiences of the Wende<sup>1</sup> and the following transformations will show, building on the work of earlier historians. Housing created an opportunity for people to retreat from the state to a place where citizens could literally ‘allow themselves room’ for private activities. The term Nischengesellschaft (niche society), coined in 1983, implied that in the GDR, the home was a space where citizens could escape from the regime to carve out their own slice of happiness.<sup>2</sup> After the fall of the Berlin Wall, this idea was often used to explain the political functionality of the East German state. Paul Betts, for example, suggests that a new

<sup>1</sup> Die Wende (‘the turning point’) refers to the historical period around German reunification, 1989–90.

<sup>2</sup> Günter Gaus, the Permanent Representative of the FRG in the GDR, spoke of ‘individuelles Glück im Winkel’—of people finding individual happiness in quiet corners. Id., Wo Deutschland liegt: Eine Ortsbestimmung (Hamburg, 1983). For Nischengesellschaft and early oral history approaches in the GDR, see Dorothee Wierling, Geboren im Jahr Eins: Der Jahrgang 1949 in der DDR—Versuch einer Kollektivbiographie (Berlin, 2002). Wierling’s examination of everyday life in the GDR managed to bring to light East German citizens’ ‘tacit accommodations’ with the political system. Another oral history project that is also particularly relevant in this context is Lutz Niethammer, Alexander von Plato, and Dorothee Wierling (eds.), Die volkseigene Erfahrung: Eine Archäologie des Lebens in der Industrieprovinz der DDR. 30 biographische Eröffnungen (Berlin, 1991). For this 1987 project, a group of West German researchers was granted access—for the very first time—to undertake field work in the GDR, during which they conducted interviews with citizens.

It has long been commonly held that state socialism and private life at home were at odds in East Germany. For GDR citizens and the regime, however, housing and the home had an important political valence that was ambiguous from the very outset, as this Special Issue on experiences of the Wende<sup>1</sup> and the following transformations will show, building on the work of earlier historians. Housing created an opportunity for people to retreat from the state to a place where citizens could literally ‘allow themselves room’ for private activities. The term Nischengesellschaft (niche society), coined in 1983, implied that in the GDR, the home was a space where citizens could escape from the regime to carve out their own slice of happiness.<sup>2</sup> After the fall of the Berlin Wall, this idea was often used to explain the political functionality of the East German state. Paul Betts, for example, suggests that a new social contract was struck after 1971 following the leadership transition to Erich Honecker, allowing GDR citizens more latitude in

<sup>1</sup> Die Wende (‘the turning point’) refers to the historical period around German reunification, 1989–90.

<sup>2</sup> Günter Gaus, the Permanent Representative of the FRG in the GDR, spoke of ‘individuelles Glück im Winkel’—of people finding individual happiness in quiet corners. Id., Wo Deutschland liegt: Eine Ortsbestimmung (Hamburg, 1983). For Nischengesellschaft and early oral history approaches in the GDR, see Dorothee Wierling, Geboren im Jahr Eins: Der Jahrgang 1949 in der DDR—Versuch einer Kollektibiographie (Berlin, 2002). Wierling’s examination of everyday life in the GDR managed to bring to light East German citizens’ ‘tacit accommodations’ with the political system. Another oral history project that is also particularly relevant in this context is Lutz Niethammer, Alexander von Plato, and Dorothee Wierling (eds.), Die volkseigene Erfahrung: Eine Archäologie des Lebens in der Industrieprovinz der DDR. 30 biographische Eröffnungen (Berlin, 1991). For this 1987 project, a group of West German researchers was granted access—for the very first time—to undertake field work in the GDR, during which they conducted interviews with citizens.